Poetry

Daniel Boland

DEMETER

You came in my dreams

                            carrying a basket of chaff and husks.

Your smile was sad and knowing – full of the world.

And so I rose very early on a rainy August morning

                            Found a puffball in the cemetery.
A BEECHWOOD POEM

The afternoon is encoded in lemon juice messages that only appear
when held to candle flame

like the faint rustling the trembling aspens make along the cemetery path.

You’d swear someone was walking behind you:

perhaps Lampman offering a few humble words of encouragement or a well-to-do lumber baron demanding that you pay heed to his enormous Victorian angel.

And on this afternoon of headstones, pileated woodpeckers, and blue spruce we discover fossils
among fragments of quarried rock.

A pre-historic butterfly returns to the light.